

Abstract

We determine the rank and chromatic number of the complements of all Kasami graphs, some of which form an infinite family of counterexamples to the now disproven rank-coloring conjecture. These graphs serve as interesting examples in investigating the deterministic communication complexity of a matrix.